Feast of All Saints Day A - Communion of Saints
November 1, 2026

This Sunday November 1 is All Saints 'Day. We are part of a family—a very big family we call the Communion of Saints. It is a family that includes you and me, those who are here with us today, and the saints we have loved who have died. It is a family that transcends time and place, even death itself. In the mystery of God, the Communion of Saints embraces the past, the present, and even the future. Today, as we remember those who have gone before us, we are reminded that in God, in Christ, through the waters of baptism, our lives are bound together forever. Baptism is a true entry into God's holiness. We are meant for greatness and should not settle for a life of mediocrity, minimalist ethics, or shallow religiosity. Holiness is not an extraordinary existence reserved for a few rare individuals. All Christians are to embrace the high standard of ordinary Christian living and the Sermon on the Mount (the Beatitudes, Matthew 5:1–12a). We are called to be saints. Although we probably do not go around calling ourselves "saints" very often, being a saint is actually at the heart of what it means to be a Christian. The "saints next door" or "the anonymous saints" are the everyday, hidden, ordinary people—family members, neighbours, and coworkers—who live out the Gospel faithfully in quiet, unremarkable ways without needing canonization. Because to be a saint—to be holy—is at the heart of what it means to follow Jesus.

This idea shows up at the heart of the novel by a Catholic priest, Graham Greene, The Power and the Glory. The novel's main character is a priest who is very far from perfect. He drinks too much, has fathered a child, and carries the weight of many past sins. Yet Greene writes of him: "He knew now that at the end there was only one thing that counted—to be a saint." On All Saints 'Sunday, we are invited to remember that the same is true for us. Few of us will come close to perfection in our lifetime. We all have a past. We all carry our own failures and wounds. And yet we are called to be saints. But what does that really mean: to be a saint? What does it mean to be holy? The word "saint" may make you picture the figures in religious paintings, with gold halos behind their heads. We may think of people who were martyrs, who lived extraordinarily virtuous lives, or who spent their days in prayer. We can easily imagine saints as people who were somehow different from ordinary human beings. And if that is what holiness means, it can seem like a pretty tall order. But All Saints 'invites us to see holiness differently.

In parts of the Old Testament, holiness can seem to mean being set apart from everything else. Think of Moses and the burning bush: God tells him not to come any closer because the ground is holy. Or think of the Holy of Holies in the Temple in Jerusalem, a place set apart from ordinary human life. In the Old Testament, holy places seem to be set apart. But in the Gospels, we see something different. For Jesus, holiness is not about being separate from the world. Instead, it is about entering more deeply into it. Jesus does not spend his life keeping his distance from human suffering, human failure, or the people others consider unclean or unworthy. Instead, he moves toward them. Holiness is Jesus going right into the mess and the suffering of human nature. Being holy is being absolutely involved, not being absolutely separated. This is what it means to be a saint. Being holy is not about being perfect or pure. It is not about becoming "otherworldly." It is not about keeping our hands clean or staying safely removed from the complicated realities of human life. The call to be a saint is very much a call to be present in this world while not being of the world. This means showing forth the values of Jesus, instead of the values of empire. This is how we are called to be "absolutely involved." This is part of what Jesus is teaching in today's Gospel, the Beatitudes. There, Jesus names those who are blessed in the kingdom of heaven. In Jesus's time, to be blessed was closely connected with holiness. A blessed person was a holy person. A holy person is someone who lives the saintly life marked by the joyful realization of being a beloved child of God, overturning the world's false measures of success.

Yet notice who Jesus calls blessed:

“Blessed are the poor in spirit.”
“Blessed are those who mourn.”
“Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness.”
“Blessed are the merciful.”
“Blessed are the peacemakers.”
“Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness ’sake.”

Jesus points toward people who are deeply engaged with the realities of human life: people who know what it means to grieve; people who long for justice; people who practice mercy; people who make peace; people who are willing to suffer for what is right. This is a way of living that is in the world, but not of the world. Pope Francis describes the Beatitudes as the blueprint for walking toward the Kingdom of God through humility, mercy, meekness, and a commitment to justice and peace. Holiness is willing to enter into the places where human life is most difficult. Holiness is both a gift and a journey: it cannot be bought or earned by human effort alone; it begins as a grace received at baptism that must be actively lived out day by day.
In other words, the saints are not people who have escaped the messiness of human life. They are the people who have learned how to meet that messiness with the love of God. And that is good news, because it means that becoming a saint does not require us to become perfect. God does not need perfect saints. What God needs are saints who are willing to make their lives a place where God’s kingdom can take root and grow; saints in whose hearts the Beatitudes take on flesh and blood. God needs saints who strive for holiness, even when they know they will fall short. Those who seek after the better way, even when they know they will never fully achieve it. Being a saint won’t be easy. Sometimes it will feel like pure joy, but sometimes it will mean struggle and sacrifice. We live in a world where not everyone is ready to embrace the values of the kingdom of God or the vision of the Beatitudes. And sometimes, as saints, we will have to struggle for them—for what is good and right. And that’s where more good news comes in: We are not alone on this journey. In fact, we will never be alone. Gathered into the Communion of Saints, we join a big family of other saints anchored in the eternal dimensions of God’s love. A family that includes people who are far and near, and even people who have died—the people we remember today. They aren’t physically here with us, but we can trust that they are present in the mystery of God, rooting for us in our own journey toward becoming saints. So, as we honour the saints, we pray that where they are we all may one day be.
